the grey gallery

An aerial photograph of Orfordness, a coastal area in Suffolk, England. The image is overlaid with a grid. A large, irregularly shaped area in the center is shaded in a light greyish-blue, representing a specific site or development. To the right, a coastline is visible with a red line and a blue line indicating a boundary or path. In the bottom right corner, there are several concentric circles and a curved line with red and green segments, likely representing a circular structure or a specific feature of interest. The background shows a mix of brownish terrain and green vegetation.

Plots and Plans:

"I have always considered drawing to be a means of coming to grips with an idea on the assumption that if I can generate a satisfactory graphic solution, there is a chance that I shall also have reached a more satisfactory grasp of its subject.

More recently I have become preoccupied by the immediacy of our environmental predicament. Living on the Suffolk Coast, this has become a real presence in daily life. Drawing is a way into this debate for me and through it I feel able to negotiate the huge range of specialist data that might otherwise reduce me to a sense of impotence."
